

Overview

Is a person required to provide their name to a police officer who stops them? The answer depends on state law, but in some states, it is required.

In June 2004, the Supreme Court ruled that a suspect had been lawfully arrested and prosecuted for refusing to give his name during a police stop. In Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial District Court of Nevada, 542 U.S. 177 (2004), the Court reasoned that a state statute can require a suspect to disclose his or her name in the course of a brief stop, if the detention was based on reasonable suspicion of a crime. Therefore, if state law requires identifying yourself to an officer, refusing to answer a request for one's name during a stop could lead to an arrest.

The following chart examines state laws regarding requirements to identify oneself to law enforcement officers, and what authority police have to demand this information. These statutes are commonly known as stop and identify statutes.

Because proving identity is often so central to an immigration case, it is helpful for immigrants to know when they have the right to refuse to identify themselves or provide ID. For example, Nevada has a statute requiring giving your name to an officer, but California does not. However, even if a state law requires individuals to identify themselves, that may or may not apply in the case of a stop by federal agents such as ICE. No federal statute requires identifying oneself to federal law enforcement officers, and immigration officers do not have authority to enforce state criminal laws like Hiibel statutes. Although ICE can arrest individuals who fail to carry their alien registration documents, they need probable cause to do so, and thus they would need to possess facts about a person's nationality and immigration status to make such an arrest.

ILRC would like to express its heartfelt thanks to the firm of Kirkland & Ellis for providing the pro bono research for this project.
